A SPANISH TRAGEDY. The Story of a Poolish Countres and Her Young Lover-A Son's Threat and its Fulfillment.

An application for a judicial admin istration of the de Nourbo estate, one of the richest properties in Spain, has brought to light a most serious and tragic family history.

Late last year Madrid was astonished. Not only astonished, but outraged in the highest degree. It became ed. Bancas, a twenty-two year old portrait one of the wildest young blades in the Kingdom. Bancas himself was the author of the rumor, having boasted of the coming union among a party of drunken acquaintances, and it was not long in reaching the ear of the Count-The latter hurried to Madrid and confronted the prospective bridegroom in his own studio, demanding a retraction of the report. This, Bancas refused to make, whereupon de Nourbo fell upon him and thrashed him within an inch of his life. He was only dragged from his senseless victim by the combined efforts of half a dozen men whom the noise of the struggle called in from the street. The studio was completely wrecked, every canvas being destroyed and all the objects of art and virtue with which it was crowded scattered about in confusion, or reduced to fragments. Among them was a trophy which had consisted of rare and valueble antique weapons. One of these a gold mounted Spanish dagger, de Nourbo picked up.

"I shall keep this," he said, "until I find out that you have really married my mother, who I verrily believe, is fool enough to espouse you. When I do find it out I will bury it in your heart. Bencas commenced next day a suit gainst his assailant for the theft of ne dagger and for the recovery of lamages for the injury inflicted on his studio. The case was heard by a Judge who was an uncle of the prosecutor and was decided in his favor. De Nourbo, who was a wealthy man, was sentenced to the payment of thirty thousand francs damages. Also to a first judgment he complied. The second, however, he managed to evade, and in returned to Paris with the weapon in his possession. On the day of the departure Baneas received a letter from him. It contained on a vicini

"Remember! F. de N." In spite of this warning, however, Bencas, a month later, disappeared from Madrid several days before the Countess had left the city, ostensibly to vis-it La Hermosa, a magnificent estate of to go to Seville, where she joined the

Francisco Carsta, Countess Nourbo, conceived the idea of having her portrait painted, This whim, innocent of itself, proved a curse to herself and her family, The artist was a young and disipate ecoundrel, well known and detested by all good Christians and moral people in Madrid. By his devillah wiles he succeeded in securing what the poor, weakwitted lady is pleased to term her affecions, and in spite of the fact that she is old enough to be his nother, and that I, her son, have had a child, who, it it had lived, would be as old as he is to-day,

Since then they have been missing, and are evidently in hiding from an outraged son's just wrath. "Therefore, this is to give warning to the villian that I shall leave no stone unturned to discover him, that I devote myself to the search for him, body and oul, and that when I do find him I shall execute the promise I made him the day I thrushed him in his own house four
